ment of the horrible circumstances which had taken place at White Bay, and the servitude in s bich the survivors of the crew were detaine shich the survivers of the crew were detailed.

By this time Mrs. Frazer was separated, and at a considerable distance from the different members of the crew, and she had given up all topes of ever being liberated from this frightful bon-of ever being liberated from this frightful bon-dage in which she was detained.

The Moreton Bay commandant, on hearing of the affair, inquired in the barracks if any of the military would volunteer to save a lady and several of the crew of the wrecked vessel from the savages in the bush, and a number offered their services at a moment's notice. By a system of manœuvring entered into by a convict who had been for some years in the bush, among the savages, the object was effected. All the survivors were to the best of Mrs. Frazer's belief, rescued from the savages.

The captain of the Mediterranean packet, in which Mrs. Frazer arrived from Sydney at Liverpool, stated that he was at Eydney at the time of the arrival of that lady, and that the circumstances detailed caused the greatest excitement there. The convict to whose extraordinary re-turn Mrs. Frazer owed her escape, obtained a free pardon from the government there, and a reward of thirty guineas.

The captain said that the unfortunate lady was not mistress of a farthing. The clothes on her back had been given to her by the commandant's wife, and Captain Frazer had been the sole support of her and three children, who were in the Orkney Islands, to which she was anxious to go as soon as possible. She was lame had almost lost the use of one arm, and the sight of one eye, by the severity of the inflictions to which she had been subjected.

The Lord Mayor—I shall most willingly re ceive contributions for her benefit, and I am sure that the call will soon be answered. I never heard of any thing so dreadful in all my ex-

Maryland Wazette.

CASTLE CROSIER.

To Prince Edward III. of England, we trace the much famed order of the garter, which surepened to be elegantly embroidered, that the King gallantly stooped, and took it from off the King gallantly stooped, and took it from off the floor, when observing some of his courtiers to smile, he held up the trophy and exclaimed, Illoni soit qui maly pense. Consequentle, as every incident in those chirafrous times was magnified into a matter of sounding import, he instituted, from the foregoing scene, the order of the garter, in commemoration of the event, and prefixed these words as the motto, or device. Singular another order may appear, yet it is perfectly adopted to the manners or customs of that age, otherwise it would baffle ingenuity itself to account for the seemingly unled astray by the siren voice of pleasure. The

A striking and prominent illustration of this universal or absorbing passion, is depicted in the genius and habits of the North American sarage, and the pompous Bashaw with his three tails is a no less personage. An Indian chief is regarded by his tribe as a superior being.-The homage paid him by his nation is calculatthat reigns. Nor is he insensible to his own importance—since he has to undergo, to entitle advantage attending these divertisements, it afhim to the chicftaincy, the most hazardous enterprises the flood and by field." His whole frame is flown into the most grotesque and unmeaning contortions, while the whoop is accompanied by the war dance, a ceremony entered into with mouth a control of the cont gesticulations, previously to callying forth to the combat. And these wild custops, in conjunccombat. And these wild customs, in conjunction with the other preparations preluding the tattained by innocent means, it is commendable, onset they are about to wage, render the steal-thy Indian an object of appalling terror, since his wartike, or belligge ent accourrements are, it any thing, designed to increase or augment the dread of the nortice in the usages and manners of this raidy son of the hammock or under-time they are stilling as they do of the implements. From the order of the Crosier to the Papal the leggins, the blanket or tunic, loosely but ceremony, the extremes of grandeur, we have the leggins, the blanket or tunic, loosely but gracefully thrown around their erect and robust forms, so as to reach or touch the upper end of the fringe of the leggins, and which is encircled by a belt of wampum; and concluding with the paint daubed or traced with grotesque or characteristic figures, and the pouch or warbag, ingeniously beader and curiously wrought with "cunning work," pendant to which are small bells, or pieces of metal in the shape of errow spikes, and which rattle or jingle, while the brave or warrior, with impetuosity rushes the brave or warrior, with impetuosity rushes onward to the strife; and thus it is, that the red man mingles, with the pursuit of his foe, the relentless, merciless, and sanguinary propensities of his ruthless nature. Neither does he spare, in the dismaying ferocity of his temper or purpose, that helpless and innocent victim of his foul intent, the harmless infant, so reckless is his vengeance. In drawing the picture of the savage red man of the woods, we are not unmindful that on reversing it there is much to mellow or soften the harsh and unsightly lineaments of the portrait we have feebly though faithfully strived to trace on the canvass, and we have been induced to these sketches of the Indian character, from the circumstance of there being in a neighbouring city an order recently established, bearing the novel and romantic deestablished, bearing the novel and romantic designation of the Order of Improved Red Men, dedicated we conclude, to St. Taminy, whose anniversary, the first of May, has been panto- who had been sent for to the camp of Commically dramatised. Although there be a great deal to condemn in the Indian, yet there is that deal to condemn in the Indian, yet there is that which attracts our wonder, admiration or pity. We are not surprised at the reluctance evinced by him to become an exile from the hunting.

The Italian Opera was to open in Paris, in by him to become an exile from the hunting grounds of his youthful career, where he has, in all the dauntlessness of his disposition, hunted or pursued the roaring lion, the grisly or shaggy beat, the wily panther, and other rave.
